Catletts creek, which is just now a pretty good sized stream flowing through the middle of Catlettsburg completely disappears for a distance of about seventy five feet. The water comes down to within a few feet of the lower bridge over the stream. A good volume when all of a sudden a whirlpool is formed and below this pool the ground is perfectly dry to a point below the bridge where it again emerges in a swiftly rushing stream. The sight is certainly a curiosity to one who has never witnessed one of the few "sinking" streams there are throughout the country.
